The geologist David Ferguson was employed by Christian Salvesen of Leith to make a geological survey of the region of worked by the company's Antarctic whaling fleet. The object was to search for economic deposits of minerals. Ferguson first visited South Georgia from 7 January to 19 April 1912, and went south again a year later to visit the South Shetlands and Graham Land in the 1913-14 whaling season. A whalecatcher was put at his disposal (Hanka in 1913-14; unknown in 1912).

The operating range of the vessel restricted Ferguson's survey to areas close to the anchorages of Salvesen's factory ships. It seems that he did not venture to the exposed south-west side of South Georgia but, in the following year, he explored much of the South Shetlands as far east as Elephant and Clarence Islands and down the Antarctic Peninsula to Flandres Bay.

Ferguson published two papers in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. No useful deposits of minerals were found but the papers include discussions of the geology of the area.

Boxes containing glass negative of these photographs were deposited with Salvesens in 1919 and eventually were transferred to the archives of the library of the University of Edinburgh. They are accompanied by a letter to Theodore Salvesen giving a very brief description of each photograph. Unfortunately the numbering of the negatives was based on their position in the box rather than by marking them. They are now out of order. Conservation and scanning of the negatives, funded by the South Georgia Association, has allowed most photographs to be identified by people familiar with South Georgia, the South Shetlands and the Antarctic Peninsula region. Some have also been reproduced in journals. Some photographs reproduced in print are missing from the negative collection.

The photographs are almost entirely scenes of geological features but some, especially in South Georgia, are of historical interest.

More information may come to light with further examination of Ferguson's report, held at Edinburgh, and his notebooks which were deposited in the University of Glasgow in 2004.
